Download A: I just read the manual, everything seems ok to me. //Number of people to be connected //scanmaster.exe -l -c -p Set the IP, SID and Username and password for the user I can't tell what kind of computer you are running this on - is it a server?

From this it seems that you need to connect with the IP instead of the Name or SID. Q: How to get events from cron but not from the user? I am using a plugin that's set by an cron to start an import. The import is triggered when specific parameters are created. I can't extend the plugin because it's third party so I just want to check the cron. I already know I can access the cron schedule but I want to know if there's a way to get what is being currently imported in "last week", in "last month".

Something that would allow me to compare, in real time, what is currently being imported with what is being imported every week. If it can't be done with the plugin, how can I achieve this? A: On the fly Depending on which specific plugin you are using you can either query the database directly, or you could use the plugins cron schedule functionality. For example with the Gravity Forms plugin you can query the schedule table for the latest cron entries and then query the content table for the current state of the import. If you are working with a template that is setting a cron to run on the fly then you could create a unique version number and record it as part of the cron trigger. Then the cron can query that table for latest triggers and then compare the values before they actually run. If you are working with an external cron, and they have a schedule set that is being executed I would recommend looking at two options. Emit something from the cron You can emit something from the cron that allows you to query it. Perhaps you could emit a custom XSD from your cron that gives you the ability to query the schedule. Alternatively use a hook Alternatively you can use a hook. Using hooks you can check for certain changes in the current schedule, instead of using a cron.
