Molecular and cellular responses of embryonic kidney cells to polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons. Alteration of gene expression in kidney is one of the earliest responses of embryos and fetus to environmental pollutants and is mediated by transcriptional activation of specific genes by various chemicals. However, the molecular mechanism of this change is still unknown. Polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) are one group of the environmental chemicals that have been known to cause kidney tumors in animals, but the molecular mechanism of kidney damage by PAHs is not clearly understood. In this study, the authors tried to determine changes of gene expression in kidney tissue by PAHs using oligonucleotide microarray technique and to clarify the role of transcription factors in the changes of gene expression. Although long term exposure to PAHs caused cell transformation in embryonic kidney (E13) cells and had an effect on their gene expression profiles, the authors were not able to detect c-Jun, one of the most potent transcription factors known to be activated by several chemicals, in nuclear extracts of treated kidney tissue, suggesting that the mRNA expression level of c-Jun in renal tissue is low and is not sufficient to induce c-

Jun transcription factor in kidney. The authors also used a cDNA microarray technique to identify genes up- or downregulated in PAH-exposed kidney tissue, and cloned two genes (Akr7a3 and Gnrg) related to the progress of PAH-induced kidney tumor. Since it has been suggested that upregulated genes play a role in cell growth (i.e. tumorigenesis) and oncogene activation, the authors analyzed the role of these two genes in the development of kidney tumors induced by various PAHs. The enactment of the e-Patent Act has triggered a patent war involving 18 countries across the globe. India, China, South Korea, Japan, Malaysia and South Africa are likely to file a joint submission soon. “We are expecting the filing of a joint submission from India, China, South Korea and Japan very soon,” said Ibrahim Qudah, global head of technology and intellectual property law at the international law firm DLA Piper. This is the second time when the patent co-operation treaty (PCT) comes into play in the battle between the US and China. India, Japan and South
