What's New In?

TOKYO, March 6 (Reuters) - Hackers crippled the websites of television networks and newspapers around the world on Wednesday following the hacks of Sony Pictures Entertainment and the U.S. Senate, a recurring tactic used by cyber attackers ahead of the March 7 U.S. presidential primaries. Firesheep, a Firefox extension that causes websites to act like a wireless network hotspot and allows people to use them to browse the internet without logging in, was used to automatically surreptitiously take over as many as 30 websites in an attack timed to coincide with the U.S. presidential primaries. The websites included CBS, NBC, CNN and the Washington Post. The method is common for cybersecurity experts, but it was the first time hackers had timed such a multi-media attack for political purposes, experts said. "It was a multichannel attack, targeting all kinds of media," said Richard Clayton, CEO of security software maker Blue Coat Systems. "I've been tracking these as they go on. This is something that is going to happen more and more as we start to see more nefarious actions that may be timed to try to garner publicity or harm someone." Derek Bambauer, who co-founded the security company GFI Software, said other hacks like this were likely to happen ahead of the U.S. March 7 elections, but it could also come as the country settles down after a grueling primary season. "It's pretty likely we will see more and more of this type of activity because people have already seen how far they can push people," he said. "They are simply gaining a bit of PR from the type of activity they are launching." Leo Lieberman, a New York University cybersecurity professor, said news reports called the cyber attack the "Hello Fluffy" attack because the hacking group said it was "hacking the government" and showing a picture of a cartoon cat. "It was obviously a prank, but it was a large one," Lieberman said. "It is important to note that the attack began at 1 a.m. PST (4 a.m. EST), about an hour and a half after the first polls closed." After hackers took over 30 Sony Pictures websites, they began demanding the studio removes what they said was a link to pornography in one of its movies, the security firm Trend Micro wrote on its blog. Within about 20 minutes the hackers took control of the sites. On
