Win7 Activator V.4.1 Release 11.2012 LinkQ: Adding .NET assemblies to C# My code is using a .NET C++/CLI assembly that I have created using the IL2CPP toolchain which contains a DLL with a C++ interface to OpenCV. My C# code references this C++ assembly and the file is added to the project and compiled without error. However, when I run the code I get an error saying that there's no class of type... that implements this interface. I've looked at the generated assembly and it says that there are no classes at all in the assembly, presumably because it's generated using IL2CPP. Is there any way to add classes to a C++/CLI assembly for reference in a C# project? A: It's simple. You just place the dll in your bin/debug folder and you are good to go. Extended hospitalization and home leave in acute-stage malaria: Should the policy of in-hospital follow-up of severe malaria be revisited? Severe malaria is often associated with complications which warrant prolonged hospitalization and/or a change in the home environment. However, it is important to remember that hospitalized and discharged patients with severe malaria are also at risk of relapses and other complications. The criteria for discharge, especially in the acute stage of the illness, should be revisited, and a follow-up visit with a physician by the patient at home should be included.Celastrol inhibits the expression of neurotrophin-3 (NT-3) and induces apoptosis in human neuroblastoma SH-SY5Y cells. Celastrol, isolated from Tripterygium wilfordii Hook f., has been identified as a medicinal plant derived compound having potent neuroprotective actions. Neurotrophin-3 (NT-3) plays a key role in neurodevelopment and neuron survival. To determine the molecular mechanism of action of celastrol in neuronal survival, we assessed its effect on the expression of NT-3, an anti-apoptotic factor, in human neuroblastoma SH-SY5Y cells. We investigated whether celastrol-induced apoptosis in these cells is mediated by the regulation of NT-3. Celastrol significantly inhibited NT-3 protein
