A microfluidic glass immunosensor for the detection of Bacillus anthracis spores at the low pg/mL level. An immunosensor for sensitive detection of Bacillus anthracis spores was developed using a microfluidic glass chip. The microfluidic glass chip developed from the commercial screen-printed glass chip allows a continuous flow of fluids using capillary forces and enables one-step operation. First, anti-B. anthracis spores antibodies were immobilized onto the microfluidic chip using an optimized concentration of an antibody dilution buffer. The sensitivity of the microfluidic immunosensor was improved at low spore concentrations in phosphate buffered saline (PBS) with 0.5% bovine serum albumin (BSA) and 0.1% Tween 20. The limit of detection (LOD) was approximately 1.0 ng/mL. Furthermore, the immunosensor can be used to detect B. anthracis spores in blood samples with a LOD of approximately 3 ng/mL. This chip is cost effective, easy to manufacture, and could be used to detect blood samples for rapid diagnosis of B. anthracis infection. Conventional cable assemblies include a single-ended cable configured to conduct a signal from one electrical component to another. However, such a single-ended 3da54e8ca3
