Slime molds, which require moisture and warmth for their growth, are ubiquitous in nature and almost always occur in association with dead organic matter. These molds form on organic substrates, which are referred to herein as wearing surfaces. As used herein, the term dead is used in a general sense and refers to any material that is no longer hydrated (or partially hydrated) and that has been rendered virtually inert by drying, by being buried, or by being exposed to other processes that render it inactive or incapable of growth. The term mold refers to a collection of minute fungal organisms and, more rarely, minute bacterial organisms that use the organic substrate as a means of growing and excreting organic substances that form the walls of their cells. These walls are referred to herein as the cyst because they provide protection to the organisms. As used herein the term organic substratex is used in a broad sense to encompass such materials as plant material, animal flesh, and animal or vegetable excrement. The term organic material, as used herein, is used in a broad sense to encompass such materials as wood, brush, leaves and grass. The term mold remediation or mold control, as used herein, refers to a process in which organic material and the attendant microbial communities are destroyed

Impact of Direct Access to the Metal-Organic Frameworks on the Size and Saturation of O<sub>2</sub>- Adsorption Cavities. We used density functional theory (DFT) calculations to explore the adsorption of O<sub>2</sub> in seven metal-organic frameworks (MOFs) with three different metal centers and different direct access pathways. The MOFs are related to the recently reported MOF-74 family, with the only difference being the type of metal centers. In MOF-74 and its structural isomer, two different types of metal centers were utilized; one is for iron and the other is for cobalt. Herein, five other MOFs, UiO-66, UiO-67, UiO-68, UiO-69, and UiO-66-NH<sub>2</sub> were considered, with the metal centers being changed to Zr<sup>6+</sup>, Ti<sup>4+</sup>, Cr<sup>3+</sup>, Mn<sup>3+</sup>, and Fe<sup>3+</sup>, respectively. All of the MOFs have a large single-chamber cavity, and the gas adsorption capacity varies from 0.72 to 1.62 mmol/g depending on the metal centers and the size of the MOFs. Specifically, the adsorption amount increases with the increase in the size of the MOFs, because the metal center is exposed to the surface when the size increases. The MOFs with the larger single-chamber cavity can achieve both a large adsorption capacity and saturation of the adsorption sites. Furthermore, the Ui 3da54e8ca3
