New: Added Tv Title and episode name to extracted folders.Q: C++, Pointers/Arrays? It has been several months since I have studied C++ and i have forgotten most of it. I need to add a method in another class (which is currently declared as a public class), and this class will be used by many others classes. My question is: What is the correct method to declare/implement the method in the other class? Is the object the other class has been passed-in to the new class object? I have read the other related questions, and I do not want to use any old-style way of using pointers. I just want to know how the new C++ standard would deal with this. A: What is the correct method to declare/implement the method in the other class? You don't even need to pass the object into the other class. Just declare it public, and use a method of that class to access it from other methods. class MyClass { public: int getId() { return id; } private: int id; }; ... int main() { MyClass a; int b = a.getId(); return 0; } Is the object the other class has been passed-in to the new class object? I don't think you quite understand how pointers and objects work. 3da54e8ca3
