1. Field of the Invention This invention is related to the field of apparatus for injection molding of a resin into a preformed article and more particularly to apparatus having a nozzle assembly which produces a non-symmetrical mass of resin that is then distributed in a syringe and injected into an injection mold. 2. Description of the Prior Art The prior art describes various apparatus and methods for injection molding of a resin into a preformed article. The preferred mode of practicing this art is to provide a metal mold having a cavity therein and then place a mass of resin in the mold. Plastic flow of the resin can be initiated by a variety of means, a common means being the application of heat. Once a sufficient amount of material is placed in the mold, the mold is closed and the two halves of the mold are clamped together and vacuum placed on the mold to ensure that the resin is trapped. A hot, high pressure source is used to force the resin from the nozzle assembly into the mold, filling the mold with the resin. This method is generally used for the injection molding of a decorative or protective coating onto a substrate, such as wood. After the resin is injected, the mold is opened and the molded article is removed, a portion of the coating remaining on the article to provide a decorative or protective effect. Typically, the resin is injected into the mold under either positive or negative pressure. While positive pressure ensures that the resin flows from the nozzle into the mold, negative pressure is necessary when the desired resin flow is sluggish. By imposing negative pressure, the resin flow is forced to enter the mold. In the injection molding of certain articles, an intentional non-symmetrical mass of the resin is desired in the mold to obtain a particular aesthetic effect. This effect can be obtained by using a nozzle with a curved surface which causes a desired non-symmetrical flow of the resin. Various nozzle assemblies have been developed. One such nozzle is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,473,942. That patent describes a nozzle assembly having a center portion adapted to be connected to a plastic material supply pipe, and a pair of co-planar, radially outwardly-extending portions, each having an end adapted to protrude beyond the end of the pipe and into the path of flow therethrough. The nozzle described in that patent thus produces a flow path of a desired non-symmetrical configuration having two flow streams of relatively equal flow, one flowing rad

Q: How do I know if I'm on the right horse to debug a problem? tl;dr: I'm a Java programmer, and I'm an inexperienced self-taught web developer. I also have a lot of experience in software development and debugging. I'm trying to fix some code that is not working on my local machine but works on the remote server. My understanding is that when people ask for my help to fix code, they are expecting me to be able to view some source code and "fix the problem". My experience with source code isn't very good, but I can follow code, so I'm reasonably confident that when I'm following someone else's instructions I'm not going to make a mistake. So when I get stuck in something I can't understand, and I'm asked to debug some java code, where are the best places to look for help? Should I: Download the source code, open the source code in a decent text editor, and start following the instructions? Try to understand the source code to find out how to fix the problem? Ask someone who knows java, have them show me how it works? Check the return values? I don't think #2 is any more likely to work than #3. I feel like there are probably many wrong answers. What is the best way to find an answer that works? A: Should I: Download the source code, open the source code in a decent text editor, and start following the instructions? This isn't always a good idea; in fact, it's very bad. There are reasons (primarily security reasons) why you may not be allowed to access the source code, and if you end up that way, you've fallen into a bit of a blind hole. This is the likely outcome in the "company" scenario in which you're employed. Assuming you can fix the problem on your own, file a ticket with your employer and let them fix the problem. If you can't do that, e-mail your employer (and your coworkers) letting them know you're trying to solve the problem, and they may provide additional guidance. That being said, if you're able to access the source
