On Saturday, Marvel announced that Captain Marvel would be getting her own solo film. The movie arrives in theaters just over two years from now, and what a blockbuster it'll be. Determined to raise their already gigantic profile, Disney and Marvel hired a marketing consultant to come up with a plan. One of their first steps was to renaming Vision. No, the superhero isn't going by the name Vision. He's going by Inhuman Vision. It was a brilliant move because the new name puts the premise of the Vision's powers right at the forefront of the character. They don't give him his powers and then brag about it. He gets his abilities from the mutations of the Inhumans. When he was called the Vision, he was a robot with the appearance of a man who was generally kept in the background by the humans. Of course, the name change reflects the fact that the Inhuman Vision isn't really a robot. He's a genetically engineered human with superpowers, just like, for example,

Captain Marvel. The Marvel movies have always had a carefully orchestrated plot with plotlines playing out over the course of multiple films. The Inhumans are on the other side of the timeline from e79caf774b
