Q: Is the cell wall of a human being permanent? I recently heard that a human being's skin cells cannot be taken out. I was curious if the cells of other living organisms, such as animals, fish, birds, bacteria, yeast, etc. also cannot be removed from their bodies at will. A: Oz's answer is correct, and I agree with him. A cell is a combination of proteins and nucleic acids, and when you tear or cut a muscle, the proteins and nucleic acids are "melted" or "liquified" into a liquid-like solution. Any cell that would reassemble itself would be disconnected from the rest of the body, since all of the cell's nucleic acids are missing. That said, it is common for bacteria to be cut away in plastic surgery. This is done both for cosmetic reasons (bacteria can become nasty-looking) and medical reasons (bacteria is a major cause of infection).

A: Oz's answer describes the changes in the proteins and nucleic acids in the cells of the body. The question is about the cell wall. A cell wall is not a protein/nucleic acid combination. It's just a layer of carbohydrates that surrounds each cell. The cell wall of yeast and bacteria is quite permeable, allowing the cell to grow and divide rapidly. However, it's relatively impermeable to bacteria and viruses. If you cut through a cell wall you simply lose the cell. In a video that was very recently posted on the site, I discuss this in more detail. A: By the way, there is a cell that can be broken apart into two cells in response to some cues. This is called mitosis. However, one of the cells is then destroyed in order to do so. Additionally, some cells do have the ability to divide, i.e. myosin can be activated to build up a semi-permeable layer around the cell so that it can divide (for example, see the Spermatozoan), but if we create a hole in the layer, or otherwise disturb the layer, then the cell can't divide. Other cells, like skin cells, are not able to do this, they are more like the cell of a fruit, and there is a container (the skin). Q: How do I get the click event to fire
