The Editing Room The Photoshop editing room is the first thing that people think of when they imagine Photoshop. A workspace that includes the following icons appears in the upper-left portion of the Photoshop window when you start the program: The Layers palette shows you all the layers in your image. By clicking the area of the Layers palette that's labeled "Down Layers," you see the layers that are behind the current layer. By default, every file has seven layers: a background, the layer you are working on, the layer below it, and the layers below that. You can work on more layers than the standard seven, but you may run into problems when you save or export your image. The Brush palette shows you all the brushes available in your image. Use brushes to apply textures and colors to your image. You can also use selected colors by using the Color palette icon (beware that choosing a color using the Color palette, as shown in the preceding figure, degrades the resulting image, as well as increasing the size of the file.) The Eraser palette allows you to get rid of areas of the image with a brush or the eraser tool. Choose an eraser size to paint on the canvas with the eraser and paint away areas of the image. The Gradient palette shows color or grayscale variations for you to apply to your image. The Gradient palette lets you use linear or radial gradients. The New palette allows you to create new layers. This palette opens the Layers dialog box, which has many options for adding new layers. The New palette also has the option to create a new, blank canvas for you to work on, or to load a new image file. The History palette holds a record of the changes you've made in your image. Using the History palette to go back in your image's edit history is an essential task for avoiding unwanted mistakes. To create a blank canvas, follow these steps: 1. Choose File⇒New to open the New dialog box, which has a blank canvas in the upper-right corner. The

We just recently discovered that our landlord has cut off the electricity at the wall due to a small electrical fault (all power is turned off in the house). However, now that we're on a normal power (not emergency power) we want to use the mains to power a remote monitoring computer, wifi router and maybe some other electronics. The easiest way seems to be to just leave the power lead on the wall - obviously we'd have to unplug any devices that we don't want to leave plugged in (if any) for an extended period of time. This is not a safety question, it's a "would this work" question A: You shouldn't cut off the power in a house. If the fault was real, then the power company could put it right. Is the house at any risk of fire? If so, you should turn the power off. If not, only then should you turn it on. You should use a switch at the entrance to the house, which switches
