About This Content Follow us on Facebook: fitness is inversely related to the rate of physical activity during chronic HIV infection. Regular physical activity (PA) is recommended in HIV-infected individuals as it is associated with improvements in physical functioning, quality of life, cardiovascular disease risk, immune function and viral load. However, little is known regarding the influence of a lack of PA on HIV disease. To quantify the influence of PA levels on HIV disease progression in an effort to provide a target for PA interventions. Among 3250 HIV-infected adults in the Multicenter AIDS Cohort Study, the amount of moderate-to-vigorous-intensity PA performed over the previous 10 years was directly and inversely associated with the CD4 count and viral load. The inverse association of PA with CD4 count was independent of adiposity and depression. Both total and moderate-to-vigorous-intensity PA were associated with CD4 count and viral load. Exercise may improve the ability of the immune system to respond to infection. Verotoxin-1-producing Escherichia coli is responsible for an acute hemolytic-uremic syndrome in a child. Verotoxin-producing Escherichia coli (VTEC) has a broad spectrum of clinical manifestations, including hemorrhagic colitis, hemolytic-uremic syndrome (HUS), and the recently described disease eosinophilic colitis. The organism also has a seasonal distribution and is associated with outbreaks of food-borne disease. In a 5-year-old girl, a rare strain of VTEC causing a HUS was isolated from the stool. Although diarrhea had been present for approximately 4 months, a new onset of HUS occurred following a diarrheal episode. Stool cultures remained negative for subsequent months, and she was maintained on intravenous fluids with phenobarbital for 1 month. Stool cultures collected 2 months later yielded a strain that produced the same O-antigen as the isolate causing the HUS. Stool culture on days 1, 15, and 29 yielded a strain that produced O2,9 and one that produced O7, but not O9, nor the O-antigen previously identified. This indicates a possible change in O-antigen expression by the organism, despite the presence of the same O-antigen gene. The isolate also had altered adhesin production, which has not been reported previously. To our knowledge, with words; your way with your pen; and maybe your way with a fork. Menu The Budget Bill of Rights There is no personal nor corporate bill of rights. We do not have an Amendment to the Constitution barring, say, the government from listening to our phone calls and watching our personal communications. We are not unconditionally guaranteed an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This is not a “right to be forgotten.” This is a right to read the book you put on your nightstand or hold the one you write every day — with no retribution, no expectation of privacy, and certainly no expectation of extra protections from anyone else who is reading your words. Ironically, what the courts have deemed the most important of our liberties are by far the least protected in the Bill of Rights. We don’t have a fourth amendment because American colonists were not interested in their own protection from coerced self-incrimination. We have no fifth amendment because the colonists were not interested in, nor poor at, asserting their own rights before they were stripped of them. Most of us tacitly accept that governments — all of them — are allowed to hold us under suspicion and justify these suspicions with circumstances or appearances of authority beyond the official standards that guide other states. Maybe that is fair, even despite the current asymmetrical breakdown of our representative republic, and perhaps this acceptance is fairer than the alternative idea that Constitutional amendments and individual protections are superfluous and, often, even dangerous. Certainly, the courts have ruled that laws passed by Congress are presumed to be constitutional (and inconvenient congressional vetoes are typically overridden). Certainly, the bar would be higher for the courts to override state or local laws. Certainly, we tolerate surveillance on some scale. But we do nothing to protect these rights on behalf of individuals or corporations. We throw the wind up in the air with small concessions on an ongoing basis. We save the last “right” for last, because we have not felt really free since the last time we wrote an amendment to the Constitution. I'm of the opinion that our current individual rights — those we are willing to assert against other individuals and groups — is only as limited as those we are willing to assert for ourselves. You are probably prepared to argue that point with me (and that you are wrong because, well, you have these rights and those rights are important to you), but this is what we have to argue.
