Conclusions {#Sec18} =========== In this paper, we have described a feature extraction framework for HSI data. First, we have utilized RBM to deal with spectral data. This approach has very high classification accuracy under different illumination conditions, and the classification accuracy of RBM is even better than that of SVM. Second, we proposed a new feature extraction algorithm based on RBM. By selecting the connection weights of RBM, the improved feature extraction algorithm could extract high-level feature from HSI data, which is very helpful for classification. Third, we have developed an improved feature evaluation method based on SSA. When the new feature extraction algorithm is combined with SSA feature evaluation, the performance of HSI classification is significantly improved, for underfitting, unbalance and overfitting situations. Some limitations of the proposed method still exist. First, the HSI data sets are all acquired under the same illumination condition, and this condition is relatively simple. Thus, the proposed method only works well for data sets acquired under the same illumination condition. Future research should improve the proposed method to adapt to more complex illumination conditions. Second, the proposed method is suitable for data from the spectrum band, but not the spatial domain. In the future, the future research should be conducted in the image domain. Third, this framework is based on the general view of RBM. In the future, this framework could be extended to other machine learning methods, such as deep Boltzmann machine or Autoencoder.
