One of them, a gentleman named Kevin, asked me about my opinion of certificates of merit. I pondered this for a moment, and said that there should be some sort of certificate for very high-quality products and services. People who can provide something of true value to society are awarded some sort of recognition for it. Kevin agreed with me, but pressed the point a little further: "A certificate of merit is good, but wouldn't it be better if the certificate was awarded to those people who are trying to do something of merit in the first place? Why should someone get the benefit of a certificate of merit for being honest in business, when they should really be getting it for being a good person?" These are good questions, and I'll try to answer them. First of all, as to his point that a certificate of merit should be awarded to those who try to do something of merit in the first place: My response is that the phrase "doing something of merit" is somewhat oxymoronic. What does "merit" have to do with things like, say, cheating, arrogance, greed, racism, or bigotry? I would suggest that it has little to do with them. If you're trying to do something of merit, you're trying to do something that's good for society, something that's of benefit to the world. Such endeavors call for reciprocity. Someone who contributes something to the world is usually going to ask for something in
