Malignant pleural mesothelioma, the major type of mesothelioma, is an asbestos-related tumor, with high mortality and poor prognosis. Reviewed here is the current state of this disease and the impact of new therapies. A brief overview of prevalence, risk factors, and diagnosis is provided. The expression profile of various mesothelioma subtypes is also reviewed. The current standard treatment for unresectable mesothelioma is combination chemotherapy. Experience with newer targeted therapies is discussed. The disease is highly variable in terms of histological, radiological, and clinical features, with no single biomarker. The major obstacle in the development of targeted therapy for mesothelioma is the absence of a validated predictive biomarker. Further research is needed to identify novel therapeutic targets. be attributed to the diversity of the subjects of study; because an assessment of all interventions delivered to a complex and dynamic population was not possible. Further limitations include the fact that access to services provided by the community health worker was dependent on the presence of such worker within the network of LTC services. Whilst Kiening et al. have shown high levels of satisfaction with quality of support provided by community health workers \[[@CR29]\] further evidence is required to demonstrate this \[[@CR30], [@CR31]\]. While we hypothesize that this difference in satisfaction is a reflection of the fact that many women living with SMI are more able to access services if they are facilitated by a member of the community health team, the possibility that a comparative experience of care by these workers is associated with a different service satisfaction cannot be ruled out.

Conclusions {#Sec14}

============ Our study highlights the challenges of implementing a complex interventions in a community setting and the need for time and resource to plan a service implementation process that takes into account how it can be influenced by the service itself, the context of the delivery and the dynamics of the population. A service that is not fully understood may have an unintended consequence; for example, it may be perceived as offering more support to users than planned by service managers. Such findings may not only help to inform design of services but could also be used to assist with planning of rollout of services for a population that is often excluded from health services. Healthcare provision is frequently framed in terms of providing'medical'
