What's new:

Airport Star Sky Airport (, ), also known as Shenzhen No. 70 Airfield (), was an airfield and is the site of the 1st Battalion of the Shenzhen Air Force's No. 99 Airbase. Named after the village of Zhoujia, the open, flat, and treeless plain was originally known as (), and is now called (). The airfield replaced No. 70 Airfield () which was constructed during the 1950s and 1960s, and evolved into No. 70 Airbase. No. 70 Airbase was finally closed when the airfield came into use. In mid-December 1995, a business opportunity was found that resulted in the relocation of the garrison. In turn, the area is now an exclusive residential community known as Shenzhen No. 70. History The village of Zhoujia was first formally recorded on a military map in 1933. At the time the village was renamed "Wuyinpu" (). Military units have not operated out of the reserve since the 1944 Battle of Shenxi. On 1 March 1984, a five storey air force radio monitoring station on the plain of, now known as Zhoujia Town () was announced. The station became part of the radio network supporting the Shenzhen Air Defense Force, the first ground station completing the 10-kilometer (6.2-mile) distance in service in 1988. In 1991, a series of shelters for the air defense force was constructed. They were constructed quickly and sparsely disguised to prevent the Taiwanese military from observing them. The new air defense garrison, No. 70 Airbase, was constructed in the 1990s. The airfield of Zhoujia, located near the Dengfeng Highway (), is jointly operated by the Shenzhen government and the Air Force. It initially underwent construction in the fall of 1991. Airfield infrastructure There is a string of large twin antennas or other communication devices on a radio tower at least 250 meters long in width in the following areas of the 735th Security Battalion: The antenna with a diameter is approximately in length, and is effectively a long half wavelength antenna.
