We also found a gradient in association of the exposures and outcomes that increased with age. We were not able to include data regarding exposure to alcohol, smoking and body mass index.

The measures of education and per capita income include individuals with any kind of education, even if it is not enough to read and write, and without minimum income. Most Brazilian municipalities have few individuals with less than complete elementary-school education, compared to other countries. Therefore, the inclusion of educational level at higher levels may have not been relevant. Our study design does not allow to investigate the causal pathway for this association. These issues may explain the reasons why the associations were not significant for all the studied outcomes, despite the strong association observed in the literature. Another limitation relates to the restricted age range of the sample, which prevented our analysis from including older individuals, for whom information regarding the BMI was not available, and more rural areas, which have higher incidence rates of hypertension and diabetes. Our results indicate that higher educational level, as a proxy for socioeconomic status, and having lived in areas with less urbanization and more sparsely populated, are associated with higher incidence rates of hypertension and diabetes, controlling for other factors. These findings are particularly important among women, in which the association of higher educational level with hypertension and diabetes was even stronger after adjustment for obesity. Further studies are needed to confirm these findings, specially among older individuals, and to assess the impact of urbanization and other risk factors that are not controlled in this study.
