Recent evidence suggests that red cell glycoprotein IIb/IIIa receptor antagonists are effective in the early prevention of fatal myocardial infarction (MI). As polymorphic variability in the platelet glycoprotein Ib-receptor exists, we sought to investigate the genetic basis of such variability, the influence of parental inheritance on platelet isoform expression, and the incidence of MI in a genetic population. Human platelets were isolated from 30 apparently healthy volunteers (15 males, 15 females), and the platelet glycoprotein Ib-receptor polymorphisms were genotyped. Patients (n = 258) who experienced MI were evaluated for platelet isoform variability and familial aggregation. The pattern of receptor expression was more variable in males, whereas females showed a monomorphic expression of the receptor in individuals homozygous for the Lutheran (Gly-926) allele. The frequency of the Lutheran allele was twice as common in healthy males as in females (0.50 versus 0.27). Though males on average expressed a higher proportion of the Lutheran allelic form of the receptor (0.51 versus 0.29), comparison of the allelic distribution in
