The hydrolysis of municipal solid waste under anaerobic conditions is investigated using a batch reactor, model wastewater, and a physical model. Constant energy input is used to control the inorganic carbon content in a system where there is substrate limitation. Batch reactors of about 25 to 300 ml show that the maximum amount of hydrolysis possible is about 60% of chemical oxygen demand (COD) at a temperature of about 190 degrees C and a pH of 7.6. The hydrolysis decreases with a rise in temperature and a concomitant rise in pH. The results show that if the hydrolysis of a large amount of COD in the absence of external energy to control the inorganic carbon can be done as effectively as in batch reactors with a small amount of input energy, large reactors may be used to hydrolyze 100,000 m3 of waste per year. The hydrolysis of waste at high temperatures can be carried out using no input energy, except that needed to keep the reactor at operating temperature. This means that, as in batch reactors, 100,000 m3 of waste can be hydrolyzed 10 large reactors without input energy of 10 megajoly of COD hydrolyzed, the same amount of COD can be hydrolyzed with a much smaller input energy of 1 megalJ.Music Friday: Listen to Jenna Brine on "Sometimes I Think We're Not Very, Um...
