This invention relates to a toilet accessory, namely an assembly including a waste pump for pumping waste from a tank in the toilet bowl to the suction side of a drain pump, an air check valve in the waste line, and a liquid level sensor, and more particularly to such an assembly wherein the air check valve is in closed position to block the flow of air from the tank to the toilet bowl when a sufficient quantity of water is in the tank, and wherein the tank pressure may be sensed to assure the liquid level of the tank is maintained above an appropriate minimum. Up until now, the most common means for assuring that a sufficient quantity of water is maintained in the toilet tank prior to flushing has been an assembly including a float mechanism, typically in the form of a ball valve or diaphragm, which is movable responsive to changes in the water level in the tank. Such a float assembly has the advantage of not requiring any moving parts in the tank, and consequently is inexpensive. However, such float assemblies are rather inaccurate in indicating the sufficient quantity of water required for flushing, and furthermore require the water to be pumped from the tank to the float before the float can be used to signal the desired flushing. This is a time consuming, and consequently wasteful, operation. Other devices have been employed as a substitute for a float, such as a paddle-wheel mechanism which is hinged to a lever which actuates a flapper valve on the drain to permit flushing only when a predetermined quantity of water is in the tank, but such paddle-wheel mechanisms are complex and hence expensive.
