In mature rats, the seasonal rhythm of ovulation and the estrous cycle are only evident in the presence of a corpus luteum. Removal of the corpus luteum from the ovaries interrupts the circadian rhythm of the estrous cycle and the ovulation cycle. By denervation of the ovaries, the corpus luteum can be destroyed independently of time of day and estrous cycle. This means that the corpus luteum can regulate the ovulation and the estrous cycle in a manner independent of time of day and estrous cycle. In mature rats, the number of gonadotropinreleasing hormone (GnRH) receptors and gonadotropin receptors is limited, while the number of receptors for luteinizing hormone (LH) and/or follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH) has increased. When the number of gonadotropin receptors increases, the secretion of LH and FSH increases with time of day, and ovulation occurs only at the appropriate time of day. The increase in the number of gonadotropin receptors causes an increase in the secretion of LH and FSH. The increase in the number of gonadotropin receptors occurs in the ovaries, but not in the pituitary, so that the time of day of ovulation does not correspond to the time of day of the increase in LH receptors. When the number of LH receptors is increased in the ovaries, the circadian rhythm of the ovulation cycle is lost and continuous ovulation occurs at any time of day. The increase in the number of LH receptors and the continuous ovulation results in that the number of LH receptors decreases in the ovaries. Consequently, the number of receptors for
