Preview Full Movie Download.On Wednesday, the North American Aerospace Defense Command conducted what it called an “unusual situation” test with a U.S. fighter jet. NORAD told The Associated Press that an “air-to-air missile” shot down the F-16. The “missile,” however, was a radar-guided missile. ADVERTISEMENT The test occurred in response to a simulated Russian attack in the Canada-U.S. border area, which left no casualties, according to NORAD. According to the AP, the incident comes amid growing tensions between the United States and Russia over the former's ongoing nuclear weapons build-up. The Obama administration has condemned Russia's conduct in the Baltic region and elsewhere. Moscow’s parliament has even proposed more sanctions. The AP said that NORAD declined to say whether the test was accidental or was carried out to train for a future, more dangerous situation. NORAD said that the test took place over the "Greater Canadian Area of Responsibility," which encompasses the Great Lakes and the Canadian provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, and that it "was both legitimate and defensive in nature." In response to the incident, the House Armed Services Committee is said to have called for greater armed forces presence in the Arctic. "Given the strategic importance of the Arctic region to national security, the committee believes it is a logical step to bolster U.S. forces in the region," Chairman Buck McKeon (R-Calif.) said in a statement. McKeon added that
