This paper describes an artificial neural network for predicting protein fold from its amino acid sequence. The network, which contains five one-hidden-layer perceptron (OLP) neurons, is designed to recognize each of the three classes of protein fold identified by alpha-carbon torsion angle (alphaCA). These classes are alpha/beta barrel, alpha helix, beta sheet, alpha helix-beta sheet, and unclassified. The architecture of the OLP neuron, the size of the training data, and the parameters of the OLP algorithm are all designed to make the network's learning-time and memory requirements small. The training and generalization of the network are accomplished by an ensemble of case-based reasoning (CBR) heuristics. We outline the necessary CBR algorithm and show that this approach is not dominated by the OLP network. Our empirical results demonstrate that the neural network can learn to recognize various classes of protein fold with reasonable accuracy and speed, given the small training and testing data sets.
