the Kellogg School of Management fame has just published a new paper “Time-to-Move” (Parsons School of the Art of Performance) which looks at the recent data on time-to-moves in the HFT market. He presents evidence that the average time-to-moves in the market has been about 50 days over the last three years. I’ve given a quick run-down of the paper here, and link to the actual paper at the bottom. The problem is that it’s a bit of an academic paper. I suspect that about 15% of the HFT desks are worth a real job in an academic institution, and the remainder are there to provide a few perks for the academics. There is a lot of discussion about whether academic research is providing practical value to Wall Street, and the answer seems to be “no”. Academic research is not providing sufficient practical value for the Universities to justify the $800m a year spent on undergraduate degrees. So, I find the paper fairly uninspiring. “I would encourage academic researchers to find ways to provide more than just a bit of empirical... insight.” – Arthur
