Bioelectrochemical methane production at a cyanobacterial biofilm electrode. The limiting factor in microbial fuel cell (MFC) technology is the low efficiency of direct methanol to methane (or electricity) conversion. In this paper, we propose that biofilm electrode with a cyanobacterial component can produce electricity, meanwhile generating methane for fuel cells. The MFC was composed of a biofilm electrode with a biofilm produced from Anabaena AHT2 suspended in a continuous flow of raceway. Biofilm formation was followed by microscopy and the electrode was tested for power output, voltage and methane yield. Power density was higher than that of the MFC without a biofilm and increased with cell density in the electrode. 5ec8ef588b
