I am using the Blackberry app for Nagios to monitor the Netgear WNDR3700v7 and a Dell server. The Netgear WNDR3700v7 runs on a Linksys/DirecWay C9L modem and a Motorola router/ISP connection. I was able to get a better firmware for the Linksys Router from Linksys, which was necessary to get the WNDR3700v7 configured. The focus of Nagios is on providing an extensible architecture that allows for third-party plug-ins to be written in Perl and C. The plug-in installation instructions are simple, but the best way to learn how to write and use plug-ins is to read the existing plug-ins themselves: We are working on a minor new feature for Nagios that would make it easier for you to keep track of the status of Nagios servers. Our goal is to write plugins to make it easier for Nagios to tell the difference between healthy servers and healthy ones. Features such as automatic handling of updates of plugins or databases, automatic checkin of updates, and automatic restart of servers would be great features for Nagios, and we wanted to put them into Nagios ourselves. We also want the feature to be open source so that it can be included into other Nagios projects. Start by installing the nagios-plugins package, which will fetch several hundred Megabytes of software. We tried using a mirror for the packages from the project's website, but the response time was slower than we like. Both our long-distance service provider and our local data center offer nagios-plugins from their servers. After some trial and error, we found these to be the fastest options. If you used nagios-plugins, some of your most commonly used plugins will now be available instantly in Nagios. 5ec8ef588b
