The next phase is marked by an attempt to combine the two approaches. one. The starting point is the thesis that evidence is something that is in every thing and does not depend on the nature of things. Therefore, it doesn't matter if a proof is a proof. In such a case, there is no difference between proof and proof. Another approach is that proofs are what is in every thing, but the proof depends on the nature of things.In that case, there is no difference between proof and proof.
