Oracle Forms 10g Tutorial For Beginners Pdf Download Fixed

The designer of Oracle Forms defines the structure of the form in its designer and generates one or more forms at compile time. These forms are then cached in the database and can be executed at runtime by the application. Compiling Forms in 12c Oracle Forms enables you to design a form that executes as a single unit. In earlier releases, creating a form required several steps. The form was compiled into a package which was then cached in the database. At compile time the package returned an image of the form with which you could interact. At runtime the cached package is loaded and the form is executed. Another approach of the past was to design the form on the SQL prompt, save this SQL as a standalone script to the desktop. You'd then load that script into the database, to execute the form. In 12c Oracle Forms compiles each form into an executable package that is cached in the database. The package has a unique name and can be identified on disk. This packaging process enables the form to be executed as a single unit. For example, you can save a package on your desktop, and the form and its supporting objects including their component parts are saved in the package. At runtime, the package is loaded and the form is executed. Saving and running the form does not require the user to load external programs or interact with the desktop. Instead the package is cached in the database, and is executed. It is also possible to share packages from one database to another. For instance, you can share an Oracle Forms package that contains a user interface component between two instances running on different computers. If a package is shared from one database to another, then that package cannot be upgraded. Instead, the package must be upgraded in both databases at the same time.
