So the question is simple: can I sit down with a brand new entry level user of Elements, discuss their projects, talk about their results and help them achieve a quality outcome, and suggest a more modest “subscription model” price point, which is comparable to the kind of price you see for Ghost Photo Studio CS6 or Zonemaster ? I think that is the better option. I would prefer that any new subscriber to spare time (or business opportunity loss) to really dive into a new project and really hone their craft. Since you spend a solid hour initial training for Elements, they can then easily spend upwards of one hour to every two minutes to achieve beautiful results. I think Elements 11 has a great deal in store to help us as photographers become the masters of our craft, and the more new users/in-depth training the better. If adding GPU assets were a feasible part of your revenue stream, I’d be willing to pay a little bit more, but frankly I just don’t see that as a realistic expectation or outcome. I think we’re both hoping for something more in line with a one-time purchase of Elements for $99.99, and that doesn’t feel like a realistic business model at this time. I think that’s what the lack of innovation at this time is really showing. In this section, I’ll take a look at some of the most important enhancements in the newest version of this industry standard image editing software. I’ll start with a basic overview of the new interface. It’s still simple, but you’ll see the biggest updates.
