A: This is more of a comment than an answer, but it seems like the real problem is that you don't have all the files on your SD card and when you go to that location to create the new recovery image, it tells you that there are not enough available space. As I understand it, the only way to fix that is to backup the /Data and /System partitions to your computer and then re-create the recovery image without the partitions. Since that is your "killer" problem and you should have some free space on your SD card, I think this is the only possible solution. A: The problem was solved thanks to your troubleshooting and the clue I got from that. From the SD card you can't select the whole folder to recover because your SD card has only 500 MB of space. Solution : Backup the file in the SD card (inside the folder that was selected in the SD card) Use an external hard drive to recover the whole data inside the SD card P.S. Always look in the SD card information for the size available and the number of files you can recover Thanks for your contribution Meta Archive for April, 2009 I'm a fan of finding interesting new ways to use tools available to me and experience new things, but I'm not a fan of spending money on websites that don't appear to be active. We have a lot of new tools and technologies at our disposal right now, but in many ways we still operate in the same way we did in the 1990's. We complain that our computers are antiquated, but we still do much of the same things on them that we did 20 years ago. The difference is that we're able to do those things faster and more efficiently, but we're also spending more time on them. As much as I like to go to websites that look active and updated, many of them look like they haven't been updated in years. That's why I chose to bypass those spammers and go to SpamCop. Now their domain name is being shut down, so that's a minor setback, but the basic premise of what they do is still good. Google has been using machine learning algorithms to detect spam for a while now and they've been improving the technology as time goes on. SpamCop has been around for a
