"The American prisoner's history began with a struggle for independence from England," he wrote in his letter, It was a beginning that would culminate in the cruel imprisonment of more than half a million Americans. The prisoner's history is today marked by the persistent violation of human rights around the world. From the "rendition" of terrorist suspects to the military commissions used to try them, the record is dark. President Barack Obama has campaigned against the treatment of detainees at the hands of President George W. Bush and his predecessor, President George H. W. Bush. The new president of the United States, Barack Obama, pledged to close the Guantanamo Bay detention center by January 2009. But more than three years later, a large number of prisoners still remain in the prison, and the military commissions for trying them are proceeding. In the first week of his presidency, Mr. Obama moved to grant legal rights to the prisoners that Congress had denied. Under his first executive order, which was drafted in January 2009, prisoners were given the right to petition the government to seek justice. But it is largely the next executive order that gave a new importance to the Guantanamo detainees. Mr. Obama issued a second executive order on Jan. 22, 2009, directing the Justice Department to establish a prisoner review committee to investigate allegations of abuse. "The executive order, though, created a process that would not be effective in holding accountable senior officials," said Mr. Shapiro, the former director of the criminal justice program at the American Civil Liberties Union. "It also created a process that failed to hold accountable people who were involved in the abuse." In the years since Mr. Obama signed the executive order, criticism of the president's detention policies has mounted. The director of the National Security Council in 2009 expressed concern that the order would set a precedent for future detainees. The number of prisoners held at Guantanamo is, however, decreasing. It was more than 400 when Mr. Obama took office. Although the administration has said that it will not transfer detainees to the United States, the prison's population has fallen to some 166. Officials say that this is because of the inability to resettle detainees in third countries. Moreover, the United States and some of its allies — most notably the United Kingdom — have moved to
