The selection tools have been improved, making all sorts of cool stuff possible. New markers can be added to the selection tool, enabling you to identify specific areas in your image. And more often than not, adding a new selection is just a matter of selecting the right shape and then moving it around. You can also use any shape as a mask (in addition to applying a mask mode to an area), and there's a rotation lock option. This lets you control the direction of an object's rotation relative to the current rotation of the canvas. The updated selection tools are far more intelligent than ever. Instead of just the basic tools, there's a transparency modifier that can actually remove parts of the image, including the parts you've selected with the selection brush. And content aware masks allow you to remove objects from an image, even if they are transparent. Now that you've selected the areas that you want to work on, it's time to make things a little bit easier. You can now perform regular interactive fills, so you don't have to leave your image and create one on a separate layer. Just select the appropriate color. Besides, you have lots of options – you can choose to replace the selection with a new solid color (to preserve your selections), or you can blend the existing color into the surrounding area. But you can also choose a softer effect, a highlight or shadow effect, or even add a slight gradient. If you think you can do better than a regular gradient, you can even create a custom gradient blend.

Colour Management Optimisation (CM 8) is maximising the use of your monitor's capacity. It is commonly used for creating images as high-resolution images are viewed at full-screen. But there is a new method explained by Adobe that allows for a more complete colour calibration. Using Adobe CM 8 can make a huge difference to lower the images' colour distortion when viewed in some popular websites. Follow these steps to use Adobe features: Open Adobe's Site, choose 'Site Information' and 'System Information' and look for CM 8 – this will open the colour management panels. Now, select 'Educate Adobe' and follow its suggestions. The colour management settings can be found under the Settings panel, located at the bottom.
