LG Multi File.Aspects of the present disclosure relate generally to telecommunication systems, and more particularly, to a distribution matrix element of a synchronous optical network (SONET) system. SONET (synchronous optical network) is a fiber-optic telecommunications standard which has been standardized by the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) since 1984 and which was adopted by the United States Federal Communications Commission (FCC) in 1985. The SONET standard defines various types of interfaces, including synchronous transport signals (STS) and synchronous payload envelopes (SPE) interfaces. SONET is often used for high-speed telecommunication networks. SONET is a time-division multiplexing technology that transmits optical signals over optical fiber. A SONET line is considered to have a nominal rate of 51.84 Mb/s. A SONET line operates on a set of well-defined intervals called synchronous transport intervals (STIs), each of which is nominally 51.84 Mb/s, thus the rate is nominally equal to the nominal rate of the STIs. This time division multiplexing creates virtual circuits, called Virtual Tributaries (VT), where each STI is allocated to a single VT. The virtual circuits may be terminated at a terminal, for example, at a time-division multiplexing (TDM) switch or a node in a distribution system. Historically, SONET equipment was developed to operate at or near the nominal rate of 51.84 Mb/s
