With that background and so much experience, I can help you make the best decision with Lightroom. As always, I've run it in a virtual machine and use 15 I7 processors with a video card (GTX 1080) to demonstrate maxed out performance. I connected two monitors, with a Razer keyboard and a cool LED setup for a monitor, and started work. Although I'm used to a bright monitor for the first hour or two of work, I switched to a laptop monitor for the second half of my working time, to demonstrate better portability. The resolution is 100% zoomed out, but it's enough for me to show you what's different in Lightroom 5. You can click on the image for a larger preview. Also, James Podolsky , our lead reviewer, has a set of photography courses on Gale Learn . You can purchase individually, or go for the entire package. There's no obligation to buy more, so perhaps start with the basic package for Lightroom . Page 1: In Lightroom 5, you can add missing metadata and adjust your camera information more easily. And the one feature I wish for is some sort of automated alignment / resizing. Of course, neither of these two are "new features," but they seem to have been out for quite some time. I know of people who have Photoshop CC
