If you buy a new camera that does not support RAW, you won't be able to use RAW conversion in Lightroom, just as earlier versions could not export RAW images. One consequence of this sacrifice is that in Lightroom 5 you cannot publish a RAW file in an external application such as Photoshop or Capture One's Studio. However, you can save the image as a TIFF, which has proved a popular workaround. Can't render out as a JPEG? No problem. Most other applications can correctly import TIFF files, even ARC/AI files. Hence, Lightroom 5 still has its place. You are no longer offered a choice of adding a layer to a RAW file if the "Layer in Photoshop" function is activated in the camera for JPEG images. This is a feature that likely confounded many users, especially those who like to edit their images for a larger variety of purposes than simply tone adjustment. This gets back to the app's original raison d'être in that it is meant to serve a wide audience with many different needs. With Lightroom 5, Adobe has added a brand new Photoshop-style Brush panel to the main file view. This panel includes a selection brush, an airbrush, and even a drawing brush for those who draw their effects in a Photoshop document. The panel has a small "pencil box" that enlarges or contracts as indicated by the user. By dragging, this box overlays new art onto the image. The Brush panel is a default setting, and it appears by default in Photoshop, Illustrator, and other Adobe products. It's a welcome addition.
